An unemployed man applied for a cleaner job at Microsoft. The manager asked for his email address. The man had no computer or email. The manager said he couldn't be employed. With his last £10 in his wallet, he bought tomatoes in bulk and sold them at 100% profit within two hours. Repeating this, he made £100 that day. He worked early and late, multiplying his profits quickly. He bought a cart to transport more tomatoes. By the end of the second year, he owned a fleet of trucks and managed a staff of a hundred former unemployed people selling tomatoes. Planning for his family future, he decided to buy life insurance. The advisor asked for his email but the man had no email. The advisor was astonished at his success without internet. The tomato millionaire replied he would be a floor cleaner at Microsoft if he had been connected to the internet from the very start.
